Comments: The Luches Utopia frequently struggles to maintain its defenses against both external enemies such as House Tokugawa and the fiercely independent Caledonians, and from within their own oppressed and outraged populace chaffing under the tyranny of the Luches dynasty of crime families and degenerate power seekers. Luches agents scour far and wide for whatever viable salvage they can claim for their "people's revolution," and theft is a common practice of these Luches privateers. In 12AL a particularly enterprising Luches agent discovered a consignment of modified Thunderbird SPACs mothballed at an abandoned Imperial training facility. While the armament had been completely removed from these sleek if obsolescent fighters, they were completely flyable and in excellent condition.

Better still, there were over one hundred of them, apparently intended as advanced training craft for fledgling Imperial fighter pilots. Acting quickly, the Luches salvage team arranged to transport these unarmed ships back to Utopian territory. Once delivered to the central Luches fighter repair facility in the Devil's Star system, the Luches authorities realized that they lacked the resources to replace the missing Pulse Lasers of the original design, and that torpedoes were at a premium in the Utopia. A more readily available solution was needed, and the proximity to the main source of fissionable materials within the Utopia led very quickly to the solution.

The Pulse Lasers were replaced by a pair of standard Autocannons, while the external torpedoes were replaced by a pair of twin Minigun pods. Due to a lack of suitable fire control hardware, the Luches were forced to fit only the most basic fire control systems in the newly refitted Thunderbirds. This inhibits the ability of Luches pilots to coordinate the fire of these separate weapons systems in battle, thus reducing the combat effectiveness of this variant of the ubiquitous Thunderbird. Overall this new variant of the Thunderbird is found exclusively in Luches service, a desperate expedient by a desperate and increasingly embattled tyrannical regime.
